THE TEXT

1- Over four years, Angela Timms's happiness and self-esteem were systematically stripped away. The 57-year-old suffers depression, posttraumatic stress disorder and anxiety and has been under the care of a psychologist for the past two years after enduring workplace bullying.

2- We've all heard such shocking stories before, but what makes Angela's case unusual is that the abuse was perpetrated by two female bosses who led a group of younger women to erode Angela's self-esteem, hamper her ability to perform her role, to socially isolate and ridicule her and eventually contribute, along with a bullying male boss, to her nervous breakdown.

3- "When I started at the job, the girls in the office were bullying a male co-worker," Angela says. "There were about six or seven girls. The office was run by a lady who led the bullying against him. I wouldn't be involved in it. They would shout at him, intimidate him and belittle him. I couldn't believe the shouting. It was just awful. I saw him almost crying a few times."

4- "I said to one girl about 19, 'why are you doing this to him, it's upsetting him so much?' and she said 'I enjoy it'." Eventually, the bullying was directed toward Angela after she was made a supervisor above the other women. "They ignored me, wouldn't speak to me. The worst thing was how they isolated me and how they would ignore me if I asked them to do something. I couldn't do my job because of that."

5- "I went to management but nothing was done, and in the end I was the one who had to leave, I just broke down." Angela said one female boss would question her about taking toilet breaks and made sarcastic remarks to the rest of the office whenever she did take a break.

6- "The impact (of the bullying) has been just devastating. They take away all your happiness. I just want to be doing my job, bringing home some money and enjoying life, but instead my health is wrecked, I have a WorkCover claim on my record and I've lost my job."

Children should not use mobile phones, a leading government adviser warned last night.

Professor Laurie Challis said children were not “little adults” and that they should not be given mobiles until they were at least 12. [Since / Even / Despite] then teenagers should use their phones to send text messages rather than talk, the [physician / physics / physicist] and expert on the effects of radiation added.

He said that [while / when / because] there was no evidence that children are more [sensitive / sensitized / sensible] than adults to the radiation given out by mobile phones, the possibility could not be ruled out.

He acknowledged that some parents may get peace of mind by giving their young child a mobile phone. But he added: “I don’t see why with young children one [shouldn’t / may not / needn’t] be a little bit more firm as a parent, [if / unless / providing] there are specific reasons why it needs to be done.

Professor Challis was vice-president of the Stewart Committee, [which / whose / whom] report formed the basis of official advice which states that [excessive / exclusive / successive] use of mobiles by children should be discouraged.
